

Pope or International Energy Agency — who said what?

Two very different authorities published documents on energy and climate change this week: can you tell them apart?

Nature staff

19 June 2015

The Paris-based International Energy Agency (IEA) posted a special report on energy and climate change on 15 June that is aimed at helping policy-makers to take action at this December's climate meetings in Paris. The next day came the early leak of Pope Francis's long-anticipated encyclical on climate change and the environment. Remarkably, the pontiff's letter draws squarely from the latest research: so much so that some of its science-influenced passages would not look out of place in an IEA report. Below, Nature picks out some choice paragraphs from both reports: can you tell who said what?

The Pope or the IEA?

Both the Pope and the International Energy Agency have recently made statements on climate change and world energy. But who said what?

Start Quiz

Created at Crowdsignal.com